SPY CHASE

By J. HARVEY BOND

It was the end of the line for Roberto, an international spy. He had been granted sanctuary in a foreign country, one for which he had stolen secrets, and now he had decided to write a book to expose the workings of the prolessional espionage organization which had hired him.

Roberto knew that his former colleagues would try to kill him, but he believed he could outsmart them. He hired several special bodyguards who worked on day night shifts to protect him from assassins

The guards worked in teams of four, one man stationed on each side of the small cottage in which Roberto lived and worked. A guard could walk from one corner to the next and peer around the corner to see if the man on that particular side was alert.
